Considering between a PRSA or a personal pension plan?

I'm a self-employed freelancer and I need to set up my own pension. What do I need to consider when deciding between a Personal Retirement Savings Account (PRSA) or personal pension plan?

Answer: Mark Reilly, Pensions Proposition Lead, Royal London Ireland

The two main types of personal pensions are PRSAs and personal pension plans (also called retirement annuity contracts).

If you don't already have a pension set up, a PRSA could be the more straightforward and easy-to-understand option – specifically, a Standard PRSA. When choosing a PRSA, you will need to decide between a Standard PRSA and a non-Standard PRSA.

With a Standard PRSA, your fees are capped so you can't be charged more than a 1% annual fund management charge (the cost of your pension fund's management). Also, the contribution charge (charged every time you make a contribution to your pension) cannot be higher than 5%. With personal pension plans and non-Standard PRSAs, the charges can be higher or lower than a Standard PRSA – however, you usually have a greater choice of investment funds to put your money into.

You can find a full register of PRSA products and providers on The Pension Authority's website.

If you want to explore a personal pension plan rather than a PRSA, most life assurance companies offer personal pension plans with different charges and investment strategies that you'll need to understand. If you are comparing plans, check how your contributions will be invested and what risk there is for that type of investment.

Pensions are a complex area, so don't be afraid to seek financial advice before choosing a pension product. Bear in mind too that you will usually need to go through a Financial Broker when opening a PRSA or personal pension plan as it is often not possible to do so with a life assurance company directly.
